One way of reducing the consumption of fuel is to reduce the mass of the fuel, that is to say the quantity of fuel needed to move the aircraft from the starting position to the destination, in particular through thermal efficiency of the engine. With current engines, there are a number of ways in which the consumption of fuel may be reduced. The first way consists of setting a nominal speed for the aircraft, that is to say the speed at which the aircraft is travelling when it reaches the destination. A thrust may then be provided, for example by a turbojet engine, at the nominal speed and at a power that corresponds to the available engine power of the turbojet engine. Another way is to provide a number of types of engine, for example in order to be able to run a short-takeoff-and-landing (STOL) engine at a reduced power during the ascent and the descent in order to save fuel or to provide a cruise power that is less than the nominal power of the engine. A drawback of these methods is that they may lead to the reduction of the maximum possible speed at which the aircraft may be flown, and a reduction in safety in particular. There therefore exists a need for a novel engine that is adapted to this type of reduction in maximum speed.1.
