If you're a beginner and have little to no experience using Photoshop, this tutorial will walk you through the basic methods that you can use to ensure that your retouching work will look professional and look like an expert editor was working on the image. A Fertile Dream? Species number and body mass in guinea fowls (Numida meleagris) in Ethiopia. The relationship between species number and body mass was examined for 17 species of Guinea Fowl (Numida meleagris) over a range of body mass of 9.8-19.5 kg using data collected from six populations in Ethiopia in an attempt to determine what factors might explain variation in this relationship. The results showed that when the body mass of an individual species was plotted against the log<sub>10</sub> of the species number, there were a significant negative linear relationship ( $F_{1,104} = 61.01$ ;  $P < 0.05$ ). This indicates that the population-size effect in contributing to the overall fecundity of a population is stronger than the positive effect of the number of new individuals added to a population. In conclusion, the results showed that body mass and species number are closely related and that the average body mass of an individual species decreases as the number of species in a population increases. However, this relationship is not constant because the most common species have larger body masses and reproduce less than species in less common populations.
